In the early 20th century, industrialist and philanthropist Andrew Carnegie funded hundreds of libraries throughout the United States as well as in other locations around the world. Several of these libraries were built in Alameda County and are still in use today. Locally, Carnegie funded four of Oakland's public libraries: the African American Museum & Library at Oakland (formerly called the Charles Greene Library and now known as AAMLO), and the Golden Gate, Temescal and Melrose branches. He also funded the Julia Morgan-designed Margaret Carnegie Library on the Mills College campus. Carnegie's generosity gave the public the opportunity to freely access the world of knowledge and learning. April 2019 marks the centennial of Carnegie's death.
